From the Relieving Principal

Another interesting week coming up highlighted by Wednesday's Athletics carnival. Let's hope the weather is kind to us.

This week I thought I might veer away from school news as such and look at the fostering of resilience in children. Resilience is the capacity to recover quickly from difficulties; to bounce back.

Sociologist Glen Elder used his research of the Great Depression (1929-1933) to show that children over 9 benefitted from increased self esteem by having to roll up their sleeves and help the family out.

Child welfare expert and Australian Professor Dorothy Scott worries that modern Australian children may be missing out on the self-worth that comes from doing meaningful help for others. She notes that in the past the family was an economic unit in which everyone needed to work and to contribute to keep food on the table. In the wake of the technological and digital revolutions she argues that families are very much a part of the consumer society full of passive consumption. She suggests modern children may be at risk of losing some of the resilience that appears to come from being useful and helping others.

So I guess what I'm trying to say is that being useful and helping others is an important part of growing up and indeed an important part of life in general. Children need these opportunities for their own self worth and development. Life is much more than modern technology to put our life around.

Until next time.....
